I have a branch containing all my work. So this branch is a workspace for me and contains all the stuff I'm working on. I have another branch, called git-ignore-everything. I ignore this branch by cloning it to my local machine. That way, I can work on stuff that I know I'll never commit. At some point, I'd like to commit the changes I've made on my git-ignore-everything branch. But if I try to commit my changes in that branch, it becomes empty. I even need to remove the changes I've made in that branch. It's not like I want to commit my stuff in git-ignore-everything, it's just I occasionally need to commit something. Is there a way to keep my changes on git-ignore-everything, but not lose my commit? A: Well if you get your changes on a branch you can "git rebase" the branch on your git-ignore-everything branch and commits on that branch will be put on your git-ignore-everything branch. But you cannot just commit on that branch, as it's a working branch. You need to checkout that working branch. If you want to keep changes on that working branch, you can add it as a "worktree" on your git-ignore-everything branch. See git-work c6a93da74d
