I have a question and I really could use some help. I just purchased a pretty expensive item from Amazon.com. I think a friend might have touched it already, and I just want to make sure it does work before opening it up. Will a cleaning with rubbing alcohol or. Should I be concerned about thermal burns? £260 - Acer Aspire One - P.S. I like to draw at the same time - what kind of heat-proof surface should I get? Thinking about buying the Asus Eee PC X205 but am torn between the 7" screen (integrated on the display) and the 9" screen (attached via a docking station). Maybe I don't want the screen to be separate if it makes it awkward to watch movies or web-surf. I'm considering getting a Sony VAIO Notebook with 9.1" screen. The main problem is that 9.1" screen is so rare on laptops (most have 8.9" or 8.1" screens). I wonder if I will feel uncomfortable using it for long. No problem but the keyboard is not a regular laptop keyboard with the Fn key, and it's hard to find usable fonts. I suppose I can look at other laptops, but I am worried about browsing web and images will be awfully small and low quality. What is the downside of using such a display? I have a Asus eeePC 9.1" 1Ghz with Win 7 x86. I own another 9.1" EeePC 9.1" model without Win 7. Both have 642 x 512 resolution. The problem is that EEEPC 9.1 with Win 7 is extremely slow and the picture is low quality (image becomes green/yellow). Why? It's not an accident. Every detail of the eeePC is optimized for the low-weight, low-power (2W CPU) design. Here is a link to the Laptop Mode Tools program that lets you test the CPU activity of your laptop. I have a Toshiba x205 with a 9" screen. I have used it for the past two years. There have been no problems with it. I bought it for the black and blue screen, which is what I preferred. It may be worth looking for an 8.9" screen with a similar picture. This is the Windows 7 that c6a93da74d
