Guidelines for the management of neoplastic meningitis--report of the Neurological Tumor Study Group of the German Society of Neurology. Neoplastic meningitis (NM) is a relatively rare complication of central nervous system (CNS) tumors. The various forms of NM are usually associated with poor neurological status of the patients. The prognosis in NM without treatment is invariably poor. Therapeutic approaches to NM are therefore directed against the underlying malignancy and/or the inflammatory response. The neurological symptomatology of NM is often caused by compression of the brainstem, thalamus, and/or cerebral cortex. Some investigations have shown that NM is also a vascular phenomenon, where blood supply in affected areas is initially impaired and is restored with tumor growth. However, specific therapeutic measures for NM are still unavailable, and there is no uniformly acceptable treatment. The primary goal of the guidelines is to allow the patient to receive the best treatment available at the time of diagnosis of NM. Supportive care alone has been shown to prolong the life expectancy of patients with NM to a few weeks. Although the guidelines recommend supportive care alone as the primary treatment in patients with NM, the recommendations may change based on the therapeutic options available at a particular time. The guidelines also provide information on the choice of supportive treatment, including the chemotherapeutic agent used, administration route, dosage, and frequency of infusions. Supportive therapy and a short-term corticosteroid treatment are the primary components of combined therapy for NM, and should be continued c6a93da74d
